The Challenge

An extra-credit experiment for Biology.

As Patrick Henry College continues its growth and development, its students have begun to recognize that a college has a past that contributes for good or ill to its present and its future. This year-book is an expression of that sense of history. The members of the class of 1966 know that what they have done during this year will, in some measure, determine what Patrick Henry College will become. In their efforts to record their activities, they have made a significant contribution to the development of a tradition; and in so doing, have made an even more significant contribution to the future of their college.

Sherman S. Patton

Director.

Mr. Francis T. West, Chairman of the Advisory Committee, and Dr. Dutton discuss future plans for the college.

Of Growth

When the idea of establishing Patrick Henry College had finally become more than just a hazy dream, those people in the community who had first visualized the creation of such a school were still faced with the reality that such a project as this would, of necessity, have to be begun on a rather limited scale. Even so, this thought did not prevent these same people from hoping that the college would eventually grow both in size and in reputation as a respected institution of higher education. If its capacity for expansion exhibited in just this past year can be used as an effective measure of what may be expected in the future, then Patrick Henry College appears to be well on its way toward meeting "the challenge of growth."

Mr. Daniel looks at a map of the possible new site for the college.

Mrs. Florence Orr, (r.), President of the Arts and Crafts Club, presents a check for the Scholarship Fund to Dr. Dutton as Mrs. John D. Martin, past President of the club, looks on.

Mr. Daniel, in his capacity as Director of Student Affairs, counsels a sophomore, Sel-da Daniel, concerning courses for the second semester.

This high degree of expansion in the past year can be clearly illustrated with the fact that enrollment has almost doubled since last year and that, consequently, both the Administrative and Instructors' staffs have been expanded. The college has acquired the services of Mr. James McIntosh as full-time biology instructor, Mrs. Dorothy Mills as full-time English instructor, and Mrs. Glen Harding as secretary to Mr. Daniel in his new capacity as Director of Student Affairs. The college has also employed Mrs. Nancy U. Stanley as its new librarian.

Along with this growth in personnel, Patrick Henry College has also found it necessary to expand its supply of teaching aids with the addition of new audio-visual and laboratory equipment.

With the growth of its Scholarship and Loan funds, the College has made it possible for even more students to attend classes, and if this and the above trends continue, it seems very likely that Patrick Henry College will also continue toward its goal—that of meeting "the challenge of growth."

The Honor Committee

The Honor Committee of Patrick Henry College is composed of seven members appointed by the faculty. It is the committee's task to investigate students accused of violating the Honor System. The Honor Committee meetings are held in secret; and if a person is accused of an honor breach, the individual is summoned before the committee to defend himself. If the person is found guilty of lying, cheating or stealing, he is dismissed from the college. There is no higher authority than the Honor Committee, and cases are not reopened unless new or pertinent information is presented on an individual's behalf.

Students who enforce the Honor System are not spies; but, rather, loyal members of the student body. Individuals who fail to report suspicious actions are themselves guilty of a breach of honor.

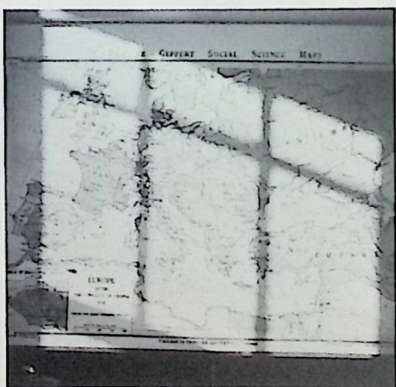

The Honor System is an old and established tradition of the University of Virginia and the University's high standards are proudly preserved at Patrick Henry College.

Biology Department

Classroom instruction.

In recent years scientists have realized the extreme importance of the study of biology and are now investigating the realm of living things carefully. A more intense study in this field could answer many questions about cancer, heart disease and the common cold. With this in mind, Patrick Henry College offers a challenging course in biology which strives to give the student a thorough understanding of the fundamentals of the science. Under the skillful direction of Mr. James McIntosh, the student enjoys a close student-teacher relationship enabling him to receive extra help if necessary. In addition to the classroom lecture, the student is able to apply the principles he has learned in lab through the close observation of plants and animals and the small-scale set-up of important processes, such as photosynthesis and respiration.

The class goes over some problems in chemical equilibrium.

Chemistry Department

The growing demand for trained chemists, physicists and engineers has placed a heavy burden on the colleges and universities of our nation. Patrick Henry College offers the student an introduction to the realm of chemistry in hopes that it will produce an increased interest in chemistry and related scientific fields. Chemistry instruction is under the direction of Dr. Sherman S. Dutton. The program, consisting of classroom and laboratory work, is designed to function coherently, enabling the student to put to use in the laboratory the concepts learned in the classroom. He is encouraged to distinguish carefully between what he observes and what he concludes from his observations. Patrick Henry College, attempting to keep pace with the increasing demand for skilled scientists, will continue to stress the importance of chemistry encouraging the student to continue in this rewarding and important field.

A laboratory exercise on pH values.

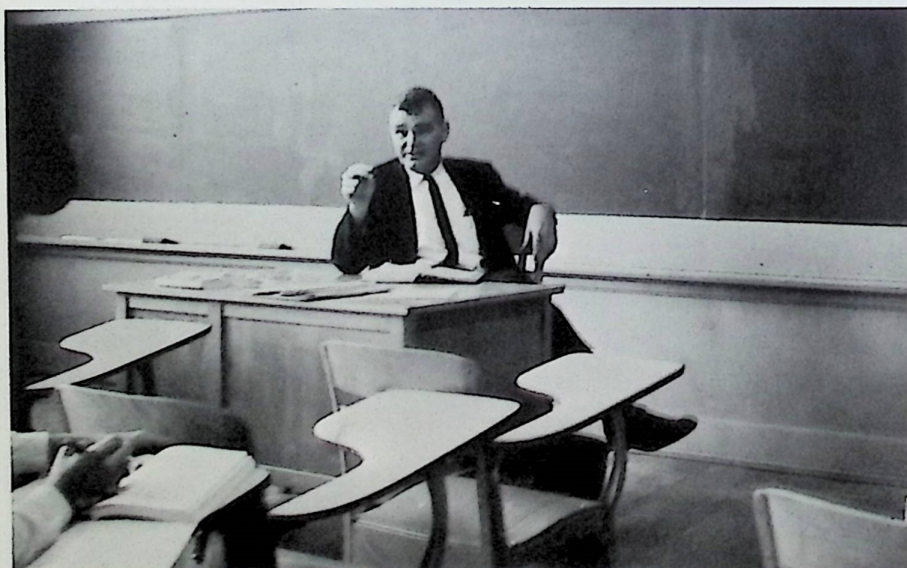

Mrs. Mills uses the opaque projector as an additional teaching aid.

English Department

The objectives of the English department at Patrick Henry College are effectively incorporated in the types of courses offered and in the methods used in teaching these courses. The ultimate goals of the department are to provide the student, as he completes both the freshman and sophomore courses, with the ability to express himself effectively, and also, with the knowledge necessary for an appreciation of the great works of English and American literature.

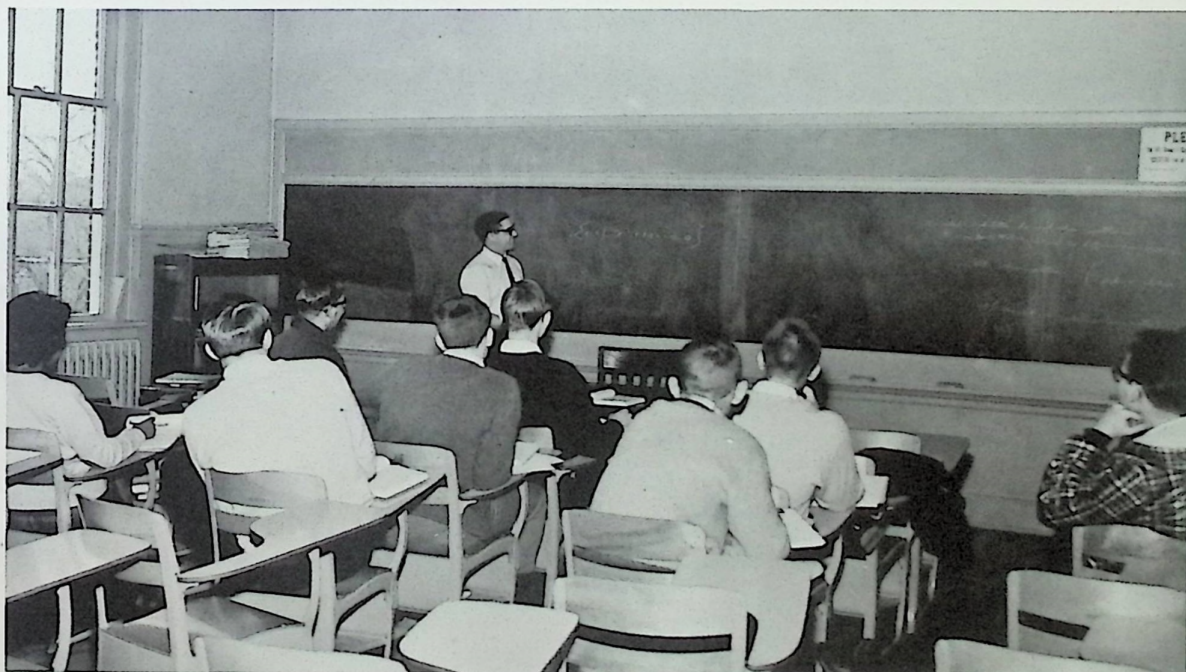

Mr. Daniel clarifies a point for one of his sophomore students.

Math Department

Math is an essential part of the curriculum at Patrick Henry College. Students are required to have two semesters of mathematics chosen from a variety of courses. At present the Math Department has only one instructor, Mr. Boyd McGee.

The math courses are designed to offer valuable training in all fields of mathematics. Basic courses in algebra, geometry and trigonometry serve as refresher courses or pave the way for more advanced concepts of mathematics. Courses in calculus and advanced calculus are also available.

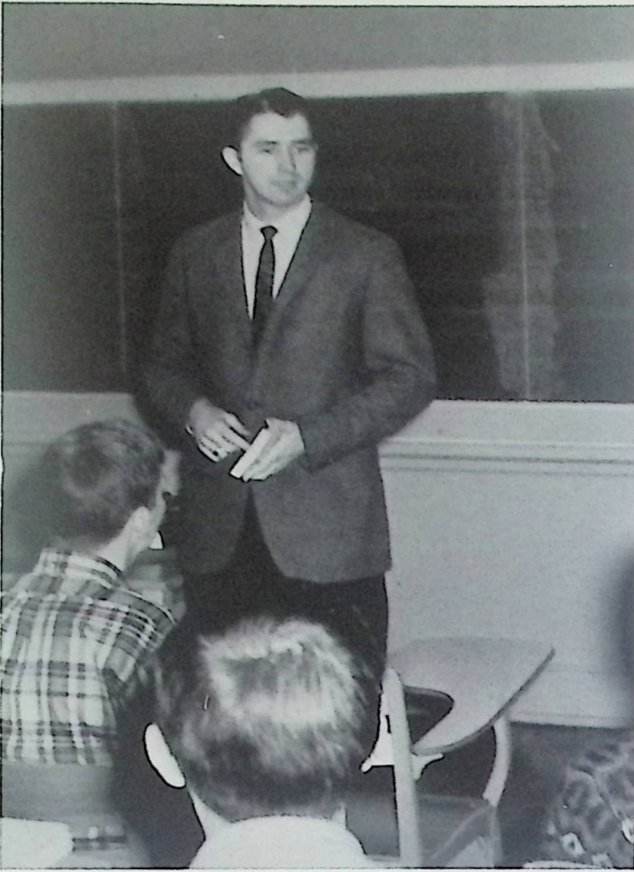

Because mathematics is closely allied with the sciences and, therefore, with modern advances, the Math Department at Patrick Henry College endeavors to give all students a solid foundation of mathematical principles which will prove beneficial to them in their college careers and in their chosen vocations.

History

History is an essential and interesting part of the curriculum at Patrick Henry College. Students are required to have six hours of history, with five courses to select from. The department began with Dr. Mary P. Adams as the only history professor. An increased enrollment necessitated the addition of Mr. David T. Morgan in the fall of 1964. This enabled the department to offer courses in Modern European, East Asian and Russian history, in addition to its original courses of Western Civilization and United States history. Each course is designed to broaden the outlook of the student so that he is aware of the accomplishments and failures of his generation compared to those of the past.

The staff of Patrick Henry College feels that a well-rounded program of social studies is necessary to help the student develop the judgment and perceptive interpretation needed in the ever-changing pattern of the world. It is for this reason that Patrick Henry College will continue to develop the student, through a comprehensive study of history, for his role in our society.

Mr. Morgan pauses for a question from a student.

Miss Adams begins a lecture in Western Civilization.

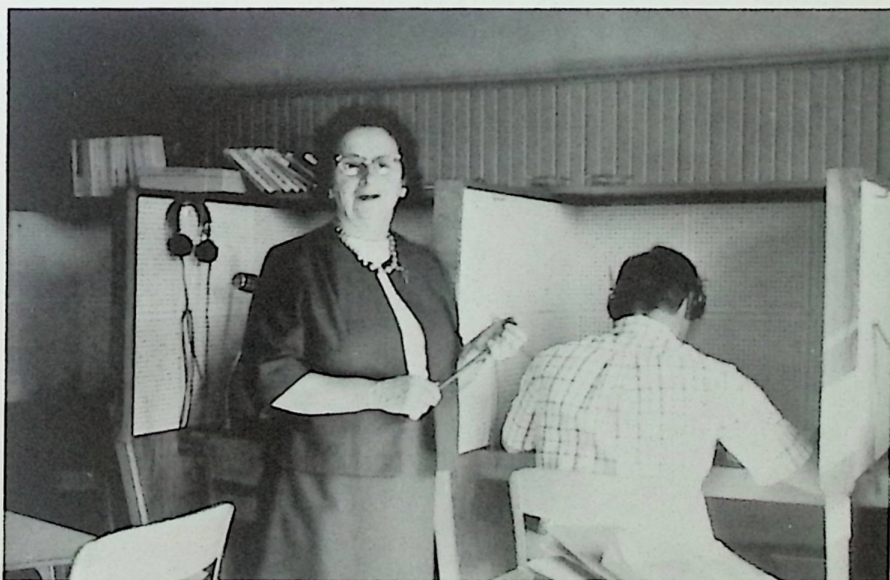

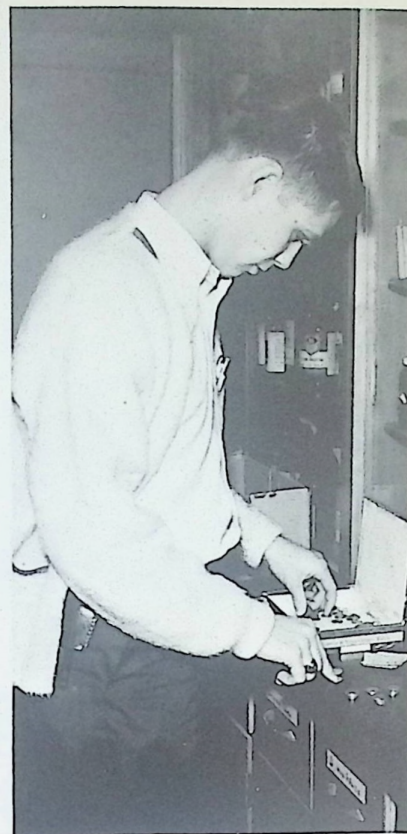

Mrs. Mitchell listens attentively to an answer from one of her Spanish students.

Foreign Languages

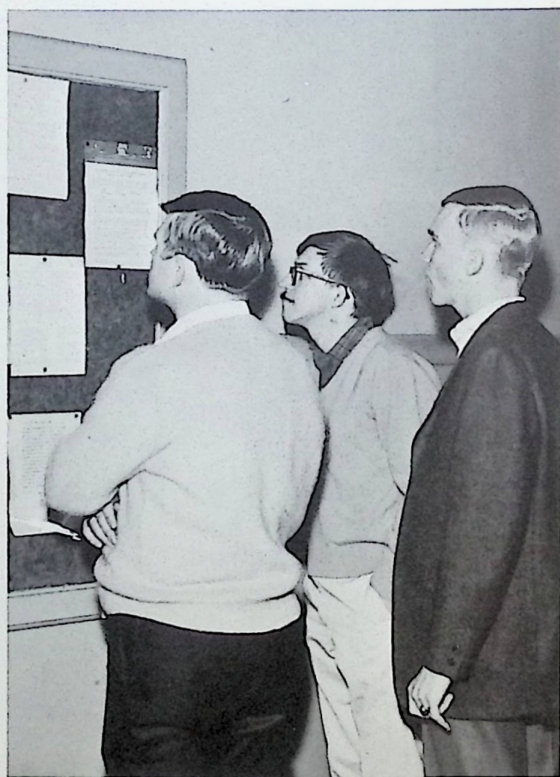

At Patrick Henry College foreign languages play an interesting as well as an essential role in the student's curriculum. The foreign language department offers two years of French and Spanish which are taught with the aid of the most modern teaching facilities. In addition to the regular classroom meetings, each student is required to attend a one-hour drill session and spend at least one hour in the language laboratory each week. The college library contains an excellent collection of the literary works of both French and Spanish authors which proves to be a valuable asset to the foreign language student. With our modern world growing ever smaller, we are challenged to understand more fully the customs and traditions of our neighbors in the world. We, at Patrick Henry College, feel that our foreign language department is helping to meet this challenge.

Miss Roy supervises students as they complete necessary practice in the language lab.
